Abstract

Augmented Reality technology as a learning medium can encourage people to think realistically, without having to bring in the practical tools directly. This research aims to determine the process of developing learning media based on augmented reality applications in TIK subjects to improve student learning outcomes at SMPN 56 Bekasi City and to determine the feasibility of learning media based on augmented reality applications in TIK subjects to improve student learning outcomes at SMPN 56 Bekasi City. The targets of this research were students in class VII at SMPN 56 Bekasi City. This research approach uses research & development research. The data analysis techniques used in this research are, 1). Material expert evaluation data analysis techniques, 2). Media expert data analysis techniques, 3). Student evaluation data analysis techniques, and 4). Field test data analysis techniques. The product was tested on a media expert, a material expert, a learning design expert, 2 students in a one-to-one trial, 10 students in a small group trial, and 30 students in a field test. Assessment uses a 1-3 rating scale. The results of this research show that the average formative evaluation of media experts is 83.33%, material experts are 86.67%, learning design experts are 81.67%, so the development of Augmented Reality (AR) learning media is categorized as very feasible. The average one on one assessment score for all aspects was 78.70%. The average achievement of small group assessments in all aspects was 88.25%. The increase in students' knowledge capacity by 20% after using Augmented Reality (AR) learning media can be seen from the students' overall learning results during the pre-test which had an average score of 57.67 to 77.67 after the post-test.

Abstract

The toughest challenge for education policy makers is to provide programmers' that can help mountain tribe children to be immersed into the English learning process, so that they can overcome their learning difficulties. This research highlights this by providing an English camp for mountain tribe children at the foot of Binaiya mountain, Central Maluku, Indonesia. This study used a quasi-experiment with a one-group pretest-posttest design. The independent variable (English camp) in this study was designed according to the context of the lives of mountain tribe children who live under the foot of Mount Binaiya, Central Maluku, Indonesia. The results of this study prove that English camp can predict the interest of mountain tribe children in Binaiya in learning English. This prediction can occur because English camp provides learning strategies that can create immersion subjects so as to facilitate children's self-determination and learning comfort. The limitations of this study are that it did not fully control for threat factors and present a comparison group. Therefore, we recommend future researchers to control for these threatening factors by considering the involvement of tutor background as well as presenting a comparison group in future research.

Moderate Islamic Education in Indonesia and Turkey: A Comparative Study of MAN Insan Cendekia Indonesia and Imam Hatip Schools in Turkey

Abstract

The idea of a "Clash of Civilizations" between Islam and the West has gained traction since the events of September 11, 2001. This has created a divide between two extreme viewpoints of the world which lead to truth claims and terrorist action. Countries like Indonesia and Turkey as large populations and developing economies country struggle with Western views that often mistakenly link Islam solely to Arab culture, neglecting the diverse interpretations in these regions. Many studies recently focused on moderate Islamic education, since the studies on the moderation of Islamic Education across different cultures are still limited. This research aims to compare the values of moderation in the Islamic education curricula of IHS Fatih Sultan Mehmet Istanbul (Turkey) and MAN Insan Cendekia Serpong (Indonesia), examining how local culture influences these values. Qualitative methods were used in variants of literature studies, collecting data from documents, books, and articles. Using comparative component analysis and data validation through source triangulation, The findings reveal that both educational systems emphasize moderation and tolerance, but their cultural contexts differ. In Indonesia, moderation is linked to Pancasila values, while Turkey combines secular principles with Islamic values. Local culture significantly shapes Islamic education; Indonesia incorporates local wisdom and diversity, whereas historical traditions and national identity influence Turkey's approach. Ultimately, the result of the study shows that Islamic education in Indonesia and Turkey is classified as moderate education with different parameters. The previous must adapt to local wisdom and the last must adapt to Islamic-secular identity.

Abstract

Indonesia is known for its predominantly Muslim population. As a nation state, Indonesia continues to uphold the principle of agreed deliberation in making various decisions in social, national and state life. Because the principle of deliberation, apart from being adhered to in Islamic principles, comes from the Al-Qur'an and Al-Hadith, this principle of deliberation is also adhered to in the ideology of Pancasila and the 1945 Constitution of the Republic of Indonesia, this proves that Islamic values are in line with and do not conflict with Pancasila values. and the 1945 NRI Constitution which strongly supports the life of constitutional democracy in Indonesia, and has sociological legitimacy as a pluralistic or pluralistic national state, with democratic factors, but also as a religious nation, which is based on God. Indonesia purpose of morality, religiosity, unity and diversity reflect the inclusiveness and moderation of our society in an authentic way. In this writing, the problem formulation can be taken, what are the rules of governance in Islam and their implementation in Indonesia based on Pancasila and the 1945 Constitution of the Republic of Indonesia. Time constraints represent the difficulty of research in exploring problems and monitoring changes that occur, due to the need for future investigations. All democratic principles based on the principle of deliberation to reach consensus in Indonesian presidentialism are contextual interpretations of religious doctrines, especially Islam, by the founding fathers of the nation who had a vision as true statesmen who were religious and nationalist. Time constraints represent the difficulty of research in exploring problems and monitoring changes that occur, due to the need for future investigations. review of this research based on previous research to explain differences and similarities to improve research with maximum validity and sustainable success rates.

Fiqh Al-Bi'Ah and Da'Wah: An Islamic Legal Response to The Global Environmental Crisis

| Badrah Uyuni¹, Mohammad Adnan², Mahfuz³

^{1,2,3}As-Syafiiyah Islamic University

Abstract

This study investigates the development of fiqh al-bi'ah (environmental fiqh) and the role of da'wah in addressing the urgent global ecological crisis. By integrating fiqh and da'wah approaches, it explores how ulama (Muslim scholars) use Qur'anic and Hadith evidence to create legal guidelines that promote environmental conservation. The research underscores the significance of da'wah in enhancing ecological awareness within the Muslim community, utilizing principles like tahqiq al-maslahah (achieving benefit) and saddu al-dhara'i (preventing harm) as Sharia foundations. It also examines how ulama and preachers incorporate environmental issues into their da'wah messages to foster collective action against environmental degradation. Key research questions include: How do ulama and preachers develop fiqh al-bi'ah to tackle global environmental challenges and in what ways can da'wah enhance ecological awareness? and How can Islamic legal concepts such as maslahah and saddu al-dhara'i be applied to environmental issues? The study employs a qualitative approach, analyzing classical and contemporary works of ulama, relevant fatwas, and Qur'anic and Hadith evidence. Data collection also includes interviews with ulama and preachers engaged in environmental advocacy, if feasible. The scientific novelty of this research lies in its fusion of fiqh and da'wah to address the global environmental crisis, filling a gap in the academic literature on how Islamic law can be applied both in fiqh and proactive da'wah to foster environmental stewardship. The study highlights a lack of integration between Islamic law and da'wah in environmental issues, despite their potential to complement each other in responding to ecological challenges. This research aims to enrich the literature on Islamic law and da'wah, offering practical guidance and ethical solutions for the Muslim world to address global environmental challenges.

Abstract

This study aims to investigate in depth the interpretation of sufism related to the six forms of da'wah communication contained in the Qur'an focusing on reception, manhaj, uslub, tafsir, spirit, and al-bayan. In interpreting the da'wah communication contained in the Qur'an, the Sufisms unravel the esoteric side of the Qur'an by assuming that the Qur'ân has a dzahir meaning and an inner meaning, so that Sufistic interpretation can make a clear contribution to the meaning of the inner aspect with the takwil device or certain gestures, while the meaning of the dzâhir has been worked on by the tafsir device. The purpose of this research is to analyze in depth the interpretation of sufistics related to the six forms of da'wah communication contained in the Qur'an which focuses on reception, manhaj, uslub, tafsir, spirit, and al-bayan. This research is qualitative research that focuses on in-depth exploration by conducting detailed analysis. The research process of this literature review begins with the identification of the concept of Sufistic interpretation as an integral part of the tested Islamic tradition. This study confirms that the Sufistic interpretation of the six forms of da'wah communication in the Qur'an offers a more comprehensive approach, focusing on reception, manhaj, uslub, tafsir, spirit, and al-bayan, da'is can strengthen the effectiveness of their da'wah through delivery that is not only informative but also touches on the spiritual and emotional aspects of the audience. Although the results of this study have not fully answered the sufistic interpretation related to the six forms of da'wah communication contained in the Qur'an which focus on reception, manhaj, uslub, tafsir, spirit, and al-bayan, however, the final result of this study is expected to make a valuable positive contribution to the development of sufistic interpretation in the context of broader da'wah communication towards more effective and efficient da'wah practices in the future. front. Research related to the sufistic interpretation of the six forms of da'wah communication in the Qur'an offers a more in-depth and comprehensive approach, focusing on reception, manhaj, uslub, tafsir, spirit, and al-bayan, according to the researcher is something interesting and new because until now no similar research has been found.

The Implementation of Sustainable Development Based on Islamic Civilization in Indonesia

Abstract

Sustainable development has emerged as a crucial global issue, with frameworks like the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) aiming to tackle urgent challenges such as climate change, poverty, and inequality. While sustainable development has been extensively examined from secular viewpoints, the integration of Islamic principles in countries with significant Muslim populations, particularly Indonesia, remains insufficiently explored. This study investigates how Islamic civilization, with core values like sharia goals (maqashid sharia), collective welfare (maslahah), and blessing for the universe (rahmatan lil 'alamin), can enhance Indonesia's sustainable development efforts. This research aims to analyze the incorporation of Islamic values and principles into Indonesia's policies and practices related to sustainable development. It seeks to explore how Islamic teachings can foster inclusive and sustainable economic, social, and environmental outcomes while examining the roles of governmental and educational institutions in this process. Employing a qualitative methodology, this study utilizes content analysis of Indonesian government policies, Islamic education institution, and other relevant documents. The research adopts a descriptive qualitative approach, processing existing data through narrative. It is a library research study, drawing information from newspapers, books, documents, journals, and scientific papers in both electronic and physical forms. The findings indicate that Indonesia has made significant progress in integrating Islamic values into its sustainable development framework, particularly through government policies focused on the five aspects of maqashid sharia. Islamic educational institutions have played a vital role in promoting sustainability by teaching values that align with both Islamic principles and global development goals. However, challenges remain, such as regional disparities in policy implementation and the need for consistent application of Islamic values across all governance levels. This research is limited by its focus on policy and educational perspectives, without extensive fieldwork or community-level impact assessments. Future studies should investigate the long-term effects of these initiatives on local communities and assess the scalability of Indonesia's model to other Muslim-majority countries. This study offers a unique perspective on how Islamic civilization can provide an ethical framework for modern sustainability challenges. By merging spiritual values with contemporary development goals, Indonesia could serve as a model for other countries aiming to incorporate religious principles into sustainable development while harmonizing Islamic values with global frameworks like the SDGs.

Islamic Economics and the Social Disparities: Understanding, Perception, and Expectation of University Students in Jakarta

| Kuncoro Hadi¹, Nuraini²

Abstract

This study investigates the relationship between university students' understanding, perception, and expectations of Islamic economics in reducing social inequality in Jakarta. The research adopts a quantitative methodology, with data collected from 522 students in the Jabodetabek region through a Likert scale-based survey. The study found that students who possess a thorough understanding of Islamic economic principles are more likely to have a positive perception of the system's ability to address social inequalities. Students' expectations of Islamic economics' role in reducing social disparities were shaped by their perceptions of its fairness and effectiveness. The findings highlight that while students are optimistic about the potential of Islamic economics to reduce inequality, they also acknowledge several barriers to its implementation, including a lack of public understanding and limited financial literacy. This study underscores the critical role of education in shaping students' perceptions and expectations of Islamic economic systems. The research concludes by recommending that educational institutions adopt more comprehensive curricula that integrate practical applications of Islamic finance, enabling students to better understand its potential in real-world contexts. Moreover, the study advocates for greater collaboration between the government and Islamic financial institutions to develop policies that address social inequalities through Islamic economic mechanisms. The findings provide valuable insights for policymakers and educators aiming to optimize the role of Islamic economics in creating a more equitable society in Jakarta.

Reorganization of the Directorate General of Taxes to the Indonesian Tax Authority Body: Is It Urgent?

| Aris Machmud¹, Jalidin Koderi²

¹Universitas Al-Azhar Indonesia, ²Sekolah Tinggi Ilmu Administrasi Mandala Indonesia (STIAM)

Abstract

The performance of the Directorate General of Taxation in supporting state finances is very dominant, where each year, the contribution of taxation income supported eighty percent of the total APBN, but the tax ratio level each year is less than eleven percent. The performance of the Directorate General of Taxation is not supported in terms of balanced rewards so efforts are needed to reorganize tax institutions at the ministerial level. The method used is normative juridical with a statutory regulatory approach and prescriptive analysis. Primary and secondary legal sources are collected from literature studies to support the analysis of problems related to reorganization, taxation, and legal reform related to taxation. The aim is to examine and analyze the optimization of state revenues by changing the tax institutions into autonomous institutions at the ministerial level. The results of the analysis show that in the future the Directorate General of Taxation needs to be upgraded to a semi-autonomous Agency or Authority through the establishment of a Tax Autonomy Body, because before there is a change in the Law on State Ministries (UUKN) and the State Finance Law by the regulator, full tax autonomy (at the ministerial level) will not be realized.

Is Dading Deed in Mediation in Court Effective?

| Suartini¹, Rijal Ibnu Sani²

¹University of Al-Azhar Indonesia, Jakarta, Indonesia, ²Universitas Muhammadiyah Tangerang

Abstract

Mediation is a dispute resolution regulated in PERMA No. 1 of 2016, providing hope for the parties to restore their image and social relations through deliberation and consensus. The product of mediation is a dading deed, an agreement made by the parties, and is recognized and has legal certainty. This study aims to analyse the effectiveness of a dading deed as a dispute resolution tool in court. This study uses a normative legal approach by reviewing applicable laws and regulations and analysing related cases resolved through mediation with a dading deed. The study results indicate that a dading deed has the same binding force as a court decision, thus providing legal certainty for the parties. However, implementing the dading deed faces obstacles, such as delays in implementation and non-compliance by one of the parties. Therefore, efforts are needed to improve the effectiveness of the dading deed through strengthening regulations and monitoring mechanisms. This study concludes that the dading deed has effectiveness in dispute resolution but needs improvement in its implementation.

Sustainability of Product Halal in the Postmarket Phase from the Perspective of Islamic Law in Indonesia

| Thalhah Thaha¹, Arizal Hamizar²

^{1,2}IAIN Ambon

Abstract

This research aims to analyze the assurance of halal products in Indonesia, particularly within the context of Islamic law in the post market phase. The study focuses on understanding how existing regulations are capable of providing legal protection for Muslim consumers and ensuring the halal status of products throughout the entire distribution process, from production to consumption. The method used is normative research with a legislative approach, a conceptual approach, and a historical approach. This research examines various regulations related to halal product assurance, including the Halal Product Assurance Law and other related regulations, and analyzes the consistency and implementation of these regulations within the context of Islamic law. The findings of the research indicate that although Indonesia has strong enough regulations to ensure the halal status of products, implementation in the post market phase still faces significant challenges. The monitoring of products already circulating in the market has not been fully effective, and there are gaps in the synchronization of existing regulations. From the perspective of Islamic law, halal assurance must cover the entire product life cycle, and therefore, more proactive monitoring and better synergy among related institutions are needed to ensure the sustainability of halal products in Indonesia.
